The possibility of the conveyance of typhoid germs by means of vegetables and fruits has long been suspected, and as a result of studies

Vegetables as a Factor in recent years, evidence has been collected that such foodstuffs play an important part in the transmission of typhoid infection.

Typhoid fever is a rnral disease; typhoid fever patients are frequently found on farms where green vegetables are cultivated for market; and, in some localities at least the practice is prevalent of using human exercta as fertilizer to force the growth of vegetables that are intended to he eaten raw.

To determine the factors responsible for the spread of typhoid fever, it is highly important to determine how long the typhoid germ can live under natural conditions. In recent years a number of investigators, working under different conditions, have recovered this be advised me to try Doan's Kidney Pills and I procured a box at J. J. Wood & Son's Prugorganism from previously contaminated soil after varying periods up to fifty days, and Mair regained the organism after eighty-four days from soil inclosed by glass and moisture added. Since the longevity of the typhoid bacillus in unsterlized water ranges from seven to thirty days, it would seem that the soil might serve as a reservoir of infection to the stream which drains it.

The latest work on this subject is reported by CREEL, who conducted experiments both within doors and in the open air, with exposure to rain and sunlight. The typhoid organism was carried up from the soil by the growing plants, and on repeated examination the organisms were recovered from the leaves and stems up to thirty-one days. A leaf of lettuce from an infected bed yielded positive cultures after three washings, thus indicating that rainfall will not free vegetables from infected material. These results have practical signifinance in view of the insanitary conditions on many farms. The demand for fresh vegetables being so great and the means of transportation so rapid, vegetables grown in one FRANK S. NEWELL section may be shipped great distances and used by large numbers of persons. There is danger of the transmission of typhoid fever by this means. The Journal of the American Mecical Association thinks that the inspection of truck farms CAUSE AND REMEDY would be advisable, and permits for the enltivation of vegetables for public sale might future is looked upon by many men properly be withheld from all farms on which improper methods of fertilizing are practiced.
